Nursing Shortages

Do nursing shortages affect patient care within an acute setting?

Abstract

The nurse is one of the most important components of the health care hierarchy in that they are the most front to front care needs of patients after the doctor has performed his diagnosis and or services. Their responsibilities span a wide spectrum of services with one of the most important being the administration of acute care. This type of care is one rung below critical care, however it is just as important in the recovery of a patient. The decline in nursing graduates over the past ten years coupled with the aging of populations, both in the United Kingdom as well as globally, has created a crisis in the health services industry whereby the number of patients per nurse has increased to unmanageable proportions.

The United Kingdom's National Health Service has been importing skilled 'Registered Nurses' for decades to fill the shortfall in developing nursing professionals and along with Ireland they are the most dependent of developed countries in filling this void through importation. This practice fails to address the problem in the United Kingdom of training and maintaining nurses to meet demands. The aging of the population, whereby the number of individuals entering the age categories require additional serious medical care has grown disproportionate to the number of nursing staff members entering the profession which further exacerbates the problem. The importance of qualified nurses for an acute care setting is a prime example of how this shortage is affecting hospitals in that many have or are seeking back in response to this problem due to the quality of care as well as legal liability issues.

Chapter 1: Introduction

Understanding acute care from a clinical perspective means that when approaching the question in an objective and analytical manner. This perspective dictates that an understanding of the historical context leading to the present state of the nursing shortages in the acute care setting need to be examined to provide a perspective on the problem as well as potential solutions. And while the United Kingdom is the focus for the examination of the question "Do nursing shortages affect patient care within an acute setting?" with the exception of the importation of nurses and historical solution, the fundamental issues are almost identical in Canada, France, the United States and other industrialized nations.

One common denominator that is at the root of the global nursing shortage is the growth in the percentage of people entering or at the age 60 years. As individuals age the onset of maladies, as well as the need for health care increases dramatically. In 1900 the percentage of the world's population above the age of 60 stood at 8.9%, by the year 2000 this had risen to 16% and is projected to climb to 22.1% by 2050. And while the preceding figures for the year 2000 on a global basis does not on the surface seem to be staggering, when one factors in that the number of people has increased from 2.7 billion in 1950 to 6 billion by the year 2000 and is projected to rise to 9.3 billion by 2050 this point takes on more meaning. More telling is that by 1999 27% of Europe's population was 60 years of age or older, with this figure expected to reach 47% by 2050.
